Arabella s good-nature made her greatly affected at this sight; and, asking her pardon for having undesignedly occasioned her so much uneasiness, begged her to be composed, and tell her in what she had offended her, that she might be able to justify herself in her apprehensions! You have made no scruple to own, Madam, said she, that you Zthink me capable of granting favours to lovers; when, Heaven knows, I never granted a kiss without a greas deal of confusion l r A d n And you had certainly much reason for consusi n, said Arabella, excessively surprised at such aconseffioni assure you I never injured you so much in my thoughts, as to suppose you ever granted a favour of so crimiml a nature. Look you there, now I said Miss Glanville, weeping more violently than before....
