Excerpt: . . . Preparing for an Uncertain Climate-Volume 2 4 I measure could well be wasted. Furthermore, future generations may have more sophisticated technologies and greater wealth that can be used for adaptation (91). The Committee on Science, Engineering, and 2 concluded that it Public Policy (COSEPUP) (27) is theoretically possible to put technology and practices into place to adjust to the changing climate as it happens if the change is gradual enough. However, the rate of climate change is, admittedly, unknown. FCC concluded: it is uncertain whether these changes-should they come--would be gradual or sudden (68). Fur- our imperfect understanding of cli-thermore, could make us vulnerable to mate processes. . . made ozone hole surprises; just as the human-over Antarctica was entirely unpredicted (69). Waiting to react to climate change may be unsatisfactory if it is possible that climate change impacts will be very costly. Of greatest concern may be those systems where there is the possibil-ity of surprise-of facing the potential for high costs without time to react--or where the climate change impacts will be irreversible. Such impacts seem more likelivf long-lived structures or In the West, center-pivot sprinklers irrigate wheat, slow-to-adapt natural systems are affected, if alfalfa, potatoes, and other crops. Increasingly adaptive measures require time to devise or efficient irrigation if techniques may be critical implement, or if current trends and actions make regional climates become drier. adaptation less likely to succeed or...
