Not illustrated. 1912 Excerpt: .at the same temperature at which it leaves the producer the loss of sensible heat will be zero. It should be possible, therefore, to design a plant so that the use of a poor gas instead of a rich one should make practically no difference in the efficiency of transmission of heat from producer to kiln. It is customary to mix the gas with air just as it enters the kiln, thus producing combustion in direct contact with the stone. The gas is blown in by forced draft, and steam is one of the chief products of combustion. These considerations indicate that in a gas-fired kiln it should be possible to force the flame farther toward the center, the burning zone should be longer, and the calcination temperature should be lower. Consequently, the kiln should have a larger capacity and should produce a better quality of...
