Excerpt: . . . a little boy (who was her only child), begged Florence, and Edith, to come and see a pretty little rabbit, which he intended to send, as a present, to Florence: they were both so delighted with this little pet-rabbit, which was very tame, that they wished to carry it home with them, but Mamma said it would be very troublesome, to carry it all that way in their hands, and, as the little fellow promised to take it to Mrs. c r Campbells in a basket, the very next morning, they reluctantly left it behind them. Just as they turned into the Green Lane, that led to the house; they were met by Mr. Campbell, who had come out to look for them; his wife took his arm, and while they sauntered slowly towards the gate, the two little girls ran a race, to...
